Monday Afternoon.

10 November, 1913.

Darling Mommy.

I thought I would write now so that you would get a letter to-morrow. When I get through this I am going up to the library to read for History, then dancing comes at five-ten. I'll get back just in time for dinner, then I'll have to dress and go to Deutscher verein. That will take up the whole evening, so I couldn't get a letter mailed before quarter of ten when the house closer, if I didn't write now. It is a busy life up here, isn't it? Probably it is good for me - I wish it would take off a little of my superfluous fat. I am beginning to be convinced that nothing will.

This morning I had a letter from Betty. She tells me of Edna Coe's new little boy. Isn't that exciting?
I imagine it will be cunning, don't you?

I have been doing nothing to-day but learn German poetry. I study going to and from classes, and all the time except when I eat.
I'll tell you about the rest of the day in to-morrow's letter. Your own.
